NOVEMBER MUSINGS.

"The grass withereth, the flower fadeth, but the word of our God shall stand forever."—Isaiah.

The gorgeous hues which autumn lent, have vanished, sad and sere

Is Nature's robe, as though she mourned the fast departing year;

The leafless, melancholy trees breathe forth a dirge-like tone,

And chill winds rustle through the withered grass with plaintive moan.

Alas! the summer of my life has faded too away,

And yet it seems as if I were a boy but yesterday,

With heart unchilled by worldliness and brow unmarked by care,

And every thought of my now fettered spirit free as air.

Where are the glorious visions now, that dawned upon my sight

In early youth, when all the earth seemed beautiful and bright?

When every hill, and rock and stream, each leaf and floweret bore

A secret language of its own that greets me now no more!

There was then a voice of melody in every sound I heard

When the dark forest's ancient depths by summer winds were stirred,

And as the strong winged tempest swept across the whitening sea,

There seemed a song of triumph in its rushing tones to me.

Those days have fled beyond recall, the world has claimed me now,

And mingling with the multitude, before its shrine I bow;

But yet the memory of the past I cannot quite repress,

And smiles conceal an aching sense that all is emptiness.

Alas! for me,—my summer's prime full soon has past away,

A 'still small voice' is whispering a warning of decay;

And the brown and lifeless leaves with which our woodland paths are strown

Remind me that a doom like theirs ere long must be my own.

A mournful note seems borne along upon the evening gale,

It strikes upon my startled ear like nature's dying wail;

And with the deepening shades of night, there comes a burthening gloom

That to my saddened spirit speaks of parting, and the tomb.

But brighter, better thoughts than these, within my heart arise,

As turning from this changeable earth I look toward the skies;

The grass may wither, and the flower may fade before the blast,

But the word of promise by our God, shall stand forever fast!
